Note to Parents

GIFTED AND TALENTED® STORY STARTERS: My First Stories will help develop your child's natural talents and gifts by providing story-telling and writing activities to enhance critical and creative thinking skills. These skills of logic and reasoning teach children how to think. They are precisely the skills emphasized by teachers of gifted and talented children. Here are some of the skills you will find:

- Deduction — the ability to reach a logical conclusion by interpreting clues
- Understanding Relationships — the ability to recognize how objects, shapes, and words are similar or dissimilar; to classify or categorize
- Sequencing — the ability to organize events, numbers; to recognize patterns
- Inference — the ability to reach logical conclusions from given or assumed evidence
- Creative Thinking — the ability to generate unique ideas; to compare and contrast the same elements in different situations; to present imaginative, numerous solutions to problems; to develop or expand on ideas, stories, or illustrations

The Fill-in-the-Blank Exercises at the beginning of this book will help your child gain confidence in the story-telling (and story-writing) process. The child has two choices: a) to select words from the appropriate word lists to drop into the blank spaces; b) to use other words or phrases of his or her own choosing to fill in the blanks.

Using the word lists expands the young child's concept of what makes a "good" story. With the word lists, the hero can be a girl or a boy, a duck, or even a kitchen appliance. It is recommended that the word lists be used first, and that you read the stories with your child again, after all the blanks have been filled in. Once the child feels comfortable with the creative freedom to tell his or her own stories, the Fill-in-the-Blank Exercises can be reused, with your child providing new words for the blanks.

To help your child grasp the “purpose” and “place” of certain words (like adjectives and nouns), read words to the child from the lists, then ask the child to make up his or her own words instead, words “like” the ones on the lists. Going over the exercises reinforces not only the function of language but its richness as well.

It is important not to be judgmental about your child’s choices. The word lists reflect the variety of language, so that the child does not form too narrow or too rigid a concept of what is “properly” a hero or “properly” a descriptive word. A child who rejects a word list and chooses to describe a morning as “yellow” and the hero as “a doorknob” has a very interesting story in the works.

Next you will find Eye-Opening Descriptive Exercises, which will encourage your child to pay more attention to his or her environment. Through the use of questions, the activities will teach the child to mine his or her own experiences and observations for story ideas. Each exercise stresses the collection of facts for immediate use in an original story. Note-taking should be encouraged. Visual as well as verbal clues and cues are used. If the child makes a visual observation, call attention to it, and/or write it down for later use in the story.

Sight is the most well-developed observatory sense, but exercises in this section will focus on all five senses to help the child develop a rich and well-rounded ability to write descriptions. Please note that these are observation and description exercises, not writing exercises. It’s okay to write down your child’s responses for him or her, and to allow the child to concentrate only on observation. When the child answers a question, ask more questions to draw out even more detail.

After the child moves through the Fill-in-the-Blank Exercises and develops an “ear, eye, nose, taste, and touch” for telling a story through the Eye-Opening Descriptive Exercises, he or she will be ready for Write the Middle and Write the Ending Exercises. Here, stories are started for the child, and the child then has to provide either the middle or the end. To help your child through the middle exercises, remember that the middle of a story is a link that provides a logical chain of events from the beginning (provided) to the end (provided). So ask the child to read the ending out loud and imagine what could have happened to lead to such an end. To help your child through the ending exercises, ask him or her to imagine more than one way the story can conclude. The more children use their imaginations, the more they will move away from clichéd endings and into creative endings.

The final section contains Advanced Exercises. These provide little help in the creation and writing of each story. The child is given scenarios for stories, but unlike the earlier exercises, no portion of a story is provided. Please encourage your child to consider his or her initial effort as a first draft. Once he or she has completed an Advanced Exercise and some time has passed, ask the child to expand on the first attempt on another piece of paper. You will both be surprised at how effortlessly the second (and third) drafts become more complete, and even more interesting stories.

Participate with and read to your children. Help them with harder words. A child's imagination should not be limited only to those words he or she can read, since children understand the meaning of words even if they cannot read them. The same is true for those words they cannot write. If necessary, record your child's stories for him or her. Regardless of whether your child can write full, complete sentences, your child will gain much from this book. Exercising the imagination is what GIFTED & TALENTED® STORY STARTERS is all about.

Good luck, have fun, and remember: good writers read, so go to the library often with your child.

Complete the story by filling in the blanks. Match the numbers under the blank lines to the word lists across from them. Choose words from the lists to tell the story. You can even choose words of your own! Read the story out loud when you are finished.

Paul stared at the dragon. The dragon gave him a dirty look.

By _____

Mr. Fister the zookeeper was in a panic. Two of his new monkeys were lost somewhere in the neighborhood! Mr. Fister looked all around. He saw a gas station, a beauty parlor, offices, and a big grocery store. Where could the monkeys be?

"Help! Help!" called someone from the grocery store. "There are monkeys in aisle seven! And they're heading for the bananas!"

Mr. Fister ran toward the store. He wondered how much trouble those silly monkeys would get into. When he got there, he found out!

People were running everywhere! A woman with a big hairdo had a jar of peanut butter turned upside down on her head. The store manager was playing pickup sticks with spilled spaghetti. Frozen pizzas were flying through the air like Frisbees! And that was just the beginning!

THE TRAPDOOR

By _____

Erik and Liz were bored. It was raining outside, and their parents were spending the day ripping up the old kitchen floor. The children sat in the kitchen, eating apples and watching their parents work. The wooden floor underneath the old one looked old, too! It would have to be polished.

Suddenly, Liz jumped up from her seat. She ran to the middle of the kitchen.

"What's this?" she said, tapping her foot on a square piece of the wooden floor. It sounded hollow!

"It looks like a trapdoor!" said Erik excitedly.

Their dad used a screwdriver to pry it open. It WAS a trapdoor! A staircase went down into the darkness. The children wondered where it led.

Their dad got a flashlight and went in first, followed by their mom. Liz and Erik went next. It was dark and _____

By _____

Once upon a time there were three big pigs who went out to seek their fortune. When it came time to build a home, the first big pig made his house out of straw. One day, a hungry wolf came to the first big pig's house.

"Wow!" said the hungry wolf. "That pig is BIG!"

What was going to happen to me? I wondered. What would my parents say? What would my teacher say? How would I go to the bathroom?

Suddenly, there was a knock on my door! I _____
